INTRODUCTION

In 1971, the Government of Canada responded to the needs of unemployed post-secondary students with a new programme, Opportunities for Youth.

This booklet provides an indication of what took place in communities across the country. It describes the creation of 27,832 new jobs, the expenditure of $24.7 million, and the undertaking of 2,316 projects from coast to coast.

Approximately 30 per cent of Opportunities for Youth projects centred around community services and activities; 19 per cent involved creating a new cultural awareness to strengthen the Canadian community. Some 28 per cent were research projects, and approximately 5 per cent dealt with information. Environmental projects accounted for nearly 4 per cent of the total, and approximately 6 per cent provided various informal educational services to communities.

Criteria for the selection of projects ensured the involvement of students in the development, administration and evaluation of their own projects. Special emphasis and encouragement was given to new and innovative services, and care was taken to assure that project proposers managed the work and the funds themselves. In addition, a comprehensive evaluation programme was undertaken to provide the statistical picture and assessment of details of the operation of the programme, so that any similar future programmes might benefit from the summer's experience.
